Early Signs of Alzheimer's

Alzheimer's disease is a brain disorder that slowly destroys memory and thinking skills, and, eventually, the ability to carry out the simplest tasks. It is estimated that more than six million Americans, most of them age 65 or older, may have dementia caused by Alzheimer's.

Memory problems are typically one of the first signs of cognitive impairment related to Alzheimer's. Some people with memory issues have a condition called mild cognitive impairment (MCI). With MCI, people have more memory issues than normal for their age, but their symptoms typically do not interfere with their everyday lives. Movement difficulties and problems with the sense of smell have also been linked to MCI. Although older adults with MCI are at greater risk for Alzheimer's, not all of them will develop this disease. Some people with MCI may even return to normal cognition.

The first symptoms of Alzheimer's disease vary from person to person. For many, decline in non-memory aspects of cognition, such as word-finding, vision and spatial issues, and impaired reasoning or judgment, may signal the very early stages of Alzheimer's disease.

Researchers are studying biomarkers (biological signs of disease found in brain images, cerebrospinal fluid, and blood) to see if they can detect early changes in the brains of people with MCI and in cognitively normal people who may be at greater risk for Alzheimer's. Studies indicate that such early detection may be possible, but more research is needed before these techniques can be relied upon to diagnose Alzheimer's disease in everyday medical practice.
